

The fiberglass Hatteras[®] because of its one

The beauty and luxurious details of the Hatteras are things you can see with your own eyes.

But there is something else important about a Hatteras you should know about—its exceptional safety and seaworthiness.

The Hatteras is probably the safest boat being built today. And its owners have told us again and again how ably it performs in heavy seas.

The reason is the Hatteras one-piece reinforced fiberglass hull.

Reinforced laminated fiberglass is the strongest and most durable material available today for marine construction.

Extra-strong, resilient construction

The Hatteras one-piece molded fiberglass hull has no hull seams or joints.

Longitudinal stringers of reinforced fiberglass, and integrally bonded marine plywood bulkheads sealed in polyester resins, result in strong yet resilient hull construction.

Because of the inherent high impact resistance of reinforced fiberglass, the Hatteras hull can absorb more severe blows than traditional materials.

This makes it a particularly safe boat in a pounding sea.

With Hatteras one-piece fiberglass construction, there are no hull seams to leak, no caulking or sanding.

The fiberglass hull is immune to attack by marine borers. It will not soak up oil, gasoline, or diesel fuel, doing away with the dangers of fuel and oil soaked bilges.

Keel is molded as an integral part of the hull for greater strength, and is designed to give maximum stability.

The Hatteras superstructure, cabin house, and walk around decks are also of one-piece seamless fiberglass construction for greater rigidity.

This brings a big saving in maintenance. There's no need to repaint for protection (you can for looks, if you wish).
